Who are the Caribbean People?

For many North Americans, the Caribbean region represents an array of relatively unvisited paradise. The region has much to offer tourists, including relaxation and recreation. Its beaches, resorts, and other attractions can be found in countries such as Jamaica, the Bahamas, Barbados and Belize. The Caribbean region encompasses over two dozen island nations or territories that, at one time or another, were colonies of European powers, primarily the United Kingdom, France, Spain, and the Netherlands. The Caribbean islands have a rich history, with a diverse mix of cultures and traditions. While tourism is a major industry in the region, the Caribbean people also face many challenges, including poverty, inequality, and political instability. Many Caribbean people come to Atlanta with important skills. In addition to those in business and professional occupations, many are entrepreneurs, artists, and musicians who bring a vibrant cultural influence to the city. Some have also been drawn to Atlanta because of the University of the West Indies (UWI), which has a campus in Atlanta and provides many students with the opportunity to continue their education in the United States. The University of the West Indies has a long history of providing education to students from the Caribbean region, and it continues to play a vital role in the development of the local community. A PERSONAL STORY

Miguel DeCoudre was born and raised in Barbados. In 1998, at the age of 16, he moved to Atlanta to join his father who was already living in the city (this father moved from Atlanta to New York when his company relocated). A year after Miguel moved to Atlanta his sister in-law joined him and their father. Their mother remains in Barbados. Miguel attended DeKalb College, where he was head of the video club, was chosen as the best production assistant for his academic achievements. During his studies at DeKalb College, Miguel was a production assistant on a documentary film and television history, and visual language.

The people of the Caribbean represent an incredibly rich diversity of cultures and ethnic groups. People from many nationalities and ethnic groups make the people inhabiting the Caribbean today that we see as diverse and different from our own. The residents of Atlanta's ethnic communities may have lived in the region for a short period of time as well as many years. The Bantu-speaking people are largely wiped out by disease and wars. The European settlers were the first to arrive in the Americas from Africa to work on plantations. The number of these workers was augmented in the late 19th century with the importation of people from the Middle East, South Asia and the Far East to indentured servants.

The diversity of these nationalities and ethnic groups means that the people inhabiting the Caribbean today can trace their ancestry to many parts of Africa, India, China, Spain, France, other European countries and the Middle East. In addition, we should note that many of these nationalities and ethnic groups mean that people that make a major contribution in business and finance, holding 930 jobs in health care occupations. One of every nine of these Caribbean people are engaged in business and professional occupations. In addition to those in business and professional occupations, there are also represented in construction and related work (680).
